So you troll the blogs calling people out for not being progressive enough, and now you're PG&E's bitch. I hope they've paid handsomely for your soul, you hypocritical scumbag.

Wow Steve, your mature and intelligent message is really thoughtful. Thanks for taking the time out to write to me, I appreciate it.

By the way, I'll have you note the readers of the Guardian voted me "best local blogger." I guess the people truly do lead.

I'll be sure to forward your comments around the campaign as yet another sign the Guardian's ongoing slide into mediocrity has hit a new low.

Again, thanks for your email, and continue to run the Guardian and the city into the ground. We natives really need outsiders like you to tell us how to think.

You don't care about the people or the Guardian (except to the extent that you probably stuffed our ballot box), so stop pretending to some kind of moral high ground or special citizenship status. You're just a bitter blogger who has sold out and I hope your decision destroys whatever small bit of credibility you had with progressives.

Your stupidity is amazing. Not only did I not even vote for myself, I didn't even KNOW such a category existed. I never told anyone to vote for me, and literally had no idea I'd won until my friend Paul Hogarth called to tell me the news.

Par for the course - you make up lies to satisfy your world view.

Stop telling lies, Steve. Stop telling lies. I have been reading the Guardian for far longer than you have, and it once was a model I used for my own paper, ages ago. But again, you don't know the facts so you continue to rant on.

I love the bitter blogger epithet. Cute. Good to know you once again have the time to attack me on facebook instead of reporting news. Good job!

The rant of desperate sellout with no credibility. Hey, shouldn't you tell your readers that you're on PG&E's payroll instead of pretending to have legitimate issues with Prop. H. That would at least be honest.

Again, Steve, you continue to astonish me with your lack of talent.

I posted a blog post a while back when I was asked to come work for the campaign stating specifically what I was working on, and I made it as plain as possible at Calitics when I've posted there with a nice big disclaimer at the top of any post I write. Other Guardian blog posters have made this point countless times. It's called Google, Steve. Look in to it.

I didn't need a PG&E job to convince me that this specific measure isn't a great idea (having lived in two cities with public power I know the positives and negatives of it fairly well). When I was approached to work on the campaign, I signed on because I needed to pay the bills.

You're an angry man, Mr. Jones. You're so angry all the time you'll tell lies, invent these crazy notions and waste time on Facebook calling me names instead of doing your job well and letting your work speak for itself. All because someone out there dares to have a point of view that differs from your own. How sad for

Your weak disclaimers on Calitics didn't begin until just last week (and you didn't even make the same disclosure on your own blog post on the same day), even though you'd been trashing the measure on various blogs for more than a month. When did you first start working for PG&E? And have you also had other corporate sponsors, either here or during your stints on the East Coast or Seattle?

It's clear you can't be objective - you're out to get me because you hate me. You're so angry you're willing to invent all sorts of nonsense.

I'll talk to your boss, if someone from the Guardian wishes to interview me. But I will not talk to you for the record because you are not an objective journalist. The disclosure is almost identical to Bob Brigham's when he worked for Mark Leno.

By the way, you stole my photo without my permission. You stole from me and told lies. You're really starting to get obsessive. All because I don't agree with your views? Maybe you need some help.
